Noteworthy Quote:
"Being an art therapist is an exciting profession that uses both your talents in art and creativity and personal skills in working with people. You have the chance to make a profound impact on the health and well-being of children, adolescents, adults, and families through your daily work and can work with clients in a wide range of settings from hospitals to schools. Although the work can be challenging, an art therapist makes an important impact on the people's lives through providing opportunities for self-expression and problem solving through drawing, painting, sculpture, photography, and other art forms. It is a rewarding profession and as an art therapist, you will make a unique contribution to the lives of people of all ages."
—Cathy A. Malchiodi, Registered Art Therapist (ATR) and Certified Professional Art Therapist (CPAT), American Art Therapy Association, Mundelein, Illinois
Art therapists (ar(t) 'ther-a-pists) plan and lead art programs to evaluate, counsel, treat, and help rehabilitate clients with mental, emotional, physical, and developmental disorders.
Throughout history, many different civilizations and cultures have taught the healing power of art and music. However, in modern medicine, the wide use of creative art therapies to treat clients is a fairly recent development. During World War II, staff in veterans' hospitals developed and organized different art, music and dance activities for clients in VA hospitals. Clients engaging in these activities showed a great improvement in their physical and mental well-being. Since that time, creative art therapies have become an effective and important method of diagnosis, treatment, and rehabilitation.
Art therapists conduct programs intended to improve the physical, mental, and emotional well-being of clients. Their clients may have behavioral, social, learning, emotional, or psychiatric disabilities, and physical disorders or disabilities.
Work Performed
Art therapists may act as primary therapists for clients, or they may serve as adjunctive therapists who administer treatments as one member of a team that may include physicians, nurses, social workers, psychiatrists, and psychologists.
Before treating a client, art therapists may administer an art therapy evaluation. They then set up a treatment plan on either their own or they confer with other members of a health care team. They assess the strengths, limitations, and interests of the client. Throughout treatment, art therapists evaluate the client through his or her art output, behavior, and verbal association. They confer regularly with the health care team, if they have one, and they adapt the program
Art therapy programs focus on ways to raise clients' self-esteem, increase self-control, and encourage clients to express themselves freely.
